History, Memory and Identity in Jordan

Lecture by Prof. Irène Maffi (University of Lausanne)

Collective memory is a very complex object of study. Since the publication of the works of Maurice Halbwachs many scholars have analyzed how a group's past is transmitted from one generation to the other in different social and cultural contexts. Material objects play a crucial role in the transmission of the social memory at least in the modern world. In order to illustrate this aspect, I will analyse the case of Jordan and try to show how the heritage has been fabricated and used to build a national past and a common identity. The creation of a "national memory" in the Jordanian Kingdom is especially interesting because it is a State created by the British less than a century ago and because at least half of its population is of Palestinian origin. How to build a shared identity for the citizens of this new political entity? How to identify a collective past for a people which were far from acknowledging a shared experience? These were the main issues the Hashemite monarchs had to face after Independence if they were to build a post-colonial nation state.
